Growing up in the eastern suburbs of Sydney in the 1950s and 60s, I was surrounded by Holocaust survivors and their children. My own parents fled Germany in 1938 when they were among the lucky few to be granted visas for Australia. So I was always aware of the destruction and havoc that prejudice and hatred wreak not only on its victims but on the whole of society.

I first heard about the righteous, people who risked their own lives to save Jews, when I read “The Diary of Anne Frank” as a child. Their courage fascinated and challenged me.

As a volunteer with Courage to Care I have heard so many stories of the righteous and survivors. It is a privilege to share these with visitors to the exhibition and to use them as inspiration to make a difference in our daily lives.
