

James Hill
Assistant Coordinator

I am fortunate to have been born in Sydney, my parents having had the foresight and ability as newlyweds to leave Germany in 1937 and head for a new life in Australia.

When the Australian Government decided to intern all “enemy aliens” my father was by then working for a small private engineering company in Sydney manufacturing tank, gun, and other components as part of the ‘war effort’. The owner of the company told the Government Officials: “If you take Herb from us this company will no longer be available for war production”.

So my parents were able to continue to raise their family in safety and contribute to their adopted country.

Courage to Care is a good way to get the important message across that even one act of kindness, or consideration, by an individual can make a difference to another person’s life.